Title III of the Violence Against Women Act: Constitutionally Safe and Sound

Carolyn Peri Weiss
RECENT DEVELOPMENT

TITLE III OF THE VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN ACT: CONSTITUTIONALLY SAFE AND SOUND

On November 12, 1996, News Channel 30 in St. Louis reported the following four stories at the inception of its broadcast:

* Mr. Baumruk, a man who was convicted in 1992 of killing his wife in a Missouri courthouse during divorce proceedings, was being considered for release from the mental health hospital to which he was confined after successfully pleading temporary insanity.

* A woman expressed fear for her life because Mr. Pennington, her former husband who was convicted of shooting her after she told him she wanted a divorce, was out on temporary release before sentencing.

* Drill Sergeant Blakely at Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri, was being charged with aggravated sexual assault.

* The sexual harassment and sexual assault investigation within the army was uncovering numerous stories at the base in Aberdeen, Maryland.¹

I. INTRODUCTION

In 1994, Congress passed the Violence Against Women Act ("VAWA"),² which was created to address "the escalating problem of violence against women."³ As part of this measure, Congress established a federal civil rights cause of action⁴ for victims of violent crimes⁵ motivated by gender.⁶ The

¹. Ten O’Clock News (KDNL television broadcast, Nov. 12, 1996). This summary was derived partly from notes taken by the author during the broadcast and was checked against and expanded by the information generously provided by Rick Brown, News Director, Channel 30.

⁴. 42 U.S.C.A. § 13981(b)-(c) (1995). Section (b) states: "All persons within the United States shall have the right to be free from crimes of violence motivated by gender." Id. Section (c) states:

A person (including a person who acts under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State) who commits a crime of violence motivated by gender and thus deprives another of the right declared in subsection (b) of this section shall be liable to the party injured, in an action for the recovery of compensatory and punitive damages, injunctive and declaratory relief, and such other relief as a court may deem appropriate.

Id.

⁵. The term "crime of violence" means—

723
purpose of this remedy, which constitutes Title III of the VAWA, is to “protect the civil rights of victims of gender motivated violence and to promote the public safety, health, and activities affecting interstate commerce.”

In the summer of 1996, the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut heard Doe v. Doe, in which the defendant claimed that Title III was unconstitutional because Congress did not have the authority to enact it under the Commerce Clause. The court rejected the defendant’s claim and

(A) an act or series of acts that would constitute a felony against the person or that would constitute a felony against property if the conduct presents a serious risk of physical injury to another, and that would come within the meaning of State or Federal offenses described in section 16 of Title 18, whether or not those acts have actually resulted in criminal charges, prosecution, or conviction and whether or not those acts were committed in the special maritime, territorial, or prison jurisdiction of the United States; and

(B) includes an act or series of acts that would constitute a felony described in subparagraph (A) but for the relationship between the person who takes such action and the individual against whom such action is taken.

6. Crime of violence motivated by gender means “a crime of violence committed because of gender or on the basis of gender, and due, at least in part, to an animus based on the victim’s gender.” Although the Act is titled the Violence Against Women Act because women disproportionately suffer gender-motivated crimes, see S. REP. NO. 138, at 37, and the funding of services and programs is consequently directed at women, see id. at 42-47, the “motivated by gender” language under Title III is gender neutral and covers men as well. Because the Act was created in response to violence against women, however, this article will focus on and talk in terms of violence against women. For a discussion of crimes that disproportionately affect women and the increasing “gender gap” in violence, see George P. Choudas,Neither Equal Nor Protected: The Invisible Law of Equal Protection, the Legal Invisibility of Its Gender-Based Victims, 44 EMORY L.J. 1069, 1083-86 (1995). See also W.H. Hallock, The Violence Against Women Act: Civil Rights for Sexual Assault Victims, 68 IND. L.J. 577, 578 (1993) (stating that 97% of all sex crime victims are women) (citation omitted).

9. Id. at 610; see 42 U.S.C.A. § 13981(a) (1995). The scope of this Recent Development is limited to the constitutionality of the VAWA under the Commerce Clause. This Recent Development will not address whether the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress’s additional basis of authority, grants Congress the power to enact the VAWA. For a discussion of this issue, see Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State University, 935 F. Supp. 779, 793-801 (W.D. Va. 1996); Brief for Intervenor-Appellant United States at (12-16), Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., (4th Cir.) (No. 96-1814, 96-2316) [hereinafter Intervenor Brief], available at <http://www.soconline.org/LEGAL/BRZONKALA> (visited Apr. 7, 1997); and Brief for Appellant, Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., (4th Cir.) (No. 96-1814, 96-2316) [hereinafter Brzonkala Brief], available at <http://www.soconline.org/LEGAL/brzonkala> (visited Apr. 7, 1997); David Frazee, An Imperfect Remedy for Imperfect Violence: The Construction of Civil Rights in the Violence Against Women Act, 1 MICH. J. GENDER & L. 163, 171-87 (1993). See generally Choudas, supra note 6. At least one author has argued that Congress could alternately achieve some of the VAWA’s goals under its Spending Clause power, by allocating the money attached to the VAWA on the condition that the states enact stricter penalties for crimes of violence against women. See Michelle W. Easterling, For held that Title III was a valid exercise of Congress' Commerce Clause power.10 Approximately one month later, however, the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia heard the same constitutional challenge in Brzonkala11 v. Virginia Polytechnic and State University12 and ruled that Title III was unconstitutional.13 Although the Doe case has settled,14 the Brzonkala case is being appealed15 and other courts are certain to have the same issue presented to them. The outcome of these decisions will determine whether the victims of gender-based violent crime will be able to vindicate their rights by suing the perpetrator in a federal forum or will have to rely on state actions and available remedies.16 This distinction is not only related to personal empowerment, which is critical in these kinds of cases,17 but is also

For a policy-based critique of Title III, see Wendy R. Willis, The Gun is Always Pointed: Sexual Violence and Title III of the Violence Against Women Act, 80 GEO. L.J. 2197, 2201 (1992) (stating that the "bill does not acknowledge that the majority of sexual assault is gender motivated...[and that] by adopting traditional definitions of rape used in criminal law, the bill may require the plaintiff to demonstrate violence beyond the sexual assault itself"); Frazee, supra, at 213 (contending that Title III's use of the traditional civil rights model for gender-motivated violence "constructs legal identities in ways that might harm women" and "does not address the reality of gender-based violence"); and Sara E. Lesch, A Troubled Inheritance: An Examination of Title III of the Violence Against Women Act in Light of Current Critiques of Civil Rights Law, 3 COLUM. J. GEND. & L. 535, 539-42 (1993) (claiming that Title III proves inadequate for victims who fall into more than one category that is protected against discrimination, focuses on an inappropriate intent requirement, and has a limited impact on systemic inequities).

For suggestions for amending Title III in response to some of these policy critiques, see Frazee, supra, at 241-56.

11. The plaintiff's name is pronounced "braun-ka-la"—the "z" is silent. Brzonkala Brief, supra note 9, at 1.

13. Id. at 793, 801.

15. See generally Brzonkala Brief, supra note 9; Intervenor Brief, supra note 9.

17. See Frazee, supra note 9, at 254 (explaining that civil rights actions provide groups "traditionally powerless in the legal system" with "at least limited power to control the process and to place themselves...against their attackers. Criminal trials, when they do occur, are often hostile settings for victims of gender-motivated violence: they may find themselves under more scrutiny than the defendant and have little, if no, say over the strategy which the prosecution pursues") (citation omitted); Lesch, supra note 9, at 539 ("This cause of action would counteract the negative effects of a criminal justice system that can be patronizing and insensitive to the needs of women who have been victimized by violence. By letting the survivor...control the course of her case...the case itself would become part of the remedy that functions to restore equality."). Willis, supra note 9, at 2200 filled with practical meaning, given the severe inadequacies of states’ current responses and remedies. Furthermore, the existence of Title III has crucial symbolic meaning, and perhaps related practical implications, by helping dictate whether society overtly recognizes such crimes as meriting as much outrage as bias-motivated crimes against other groups.

Part II of this Recent Development briefly reviews the legislative history behind the VAWA, placing particular emphasis on the history related to Title III. Part III summarizes the analyses of the Doe and Brzonkala cases and then critiques their analyses in light of the VAWA’s legislative history, the Supreme Court’s recent Commerce Clause case United States v. Lopez, and other Commerce Clause cases. Part III concludes that Title III is a valid exercise of Congress’ Commerce Clause power.

II. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

A. Congressional Findings

The Violence Against Women Act was first introduced in 1990, was

("The Senate Judiciary Committee recognizes that ‘the victims of this violence are reduced to symbols of group hatred [with] no individual power to change or escape. The violence not only wounds physically, it degrades and terrorizes, instilling fear and inhibiting the lives of all those similarly situated.’") (footnote omitted) (quoting S. REP. No. 102-197, at 43 (1991)).

18. See infra notes 46-52 and accompanying text.

19. See Lesch, supra note 9, at 539 ("Title III imbues the struggle for gender parity with a prominence and priority that our government appropriately accords to only a few issues... Federalizing this issue would send a powerful message that the violent enforcement of a gender caste system will not be tolerated."); see also infra note 20 and accompanying text.

20. See infra Part II.B (discussing the hope of Title III supporters that the provision will help to change attitudes about gender-motivated violence); see also Lesch, supra note 9, at 539; Elizabeth M. Schneider, Epilogue: Making Reconceptualization of Violence Against Women Real, 58 ALB. L. REV. 1245, 1250 (1995) (contending that “deep problems of denial and resistance to integrating insights about domestic violence into both individual behavior and social policy... stand in the way of social change, and the way in which these attitudes are reinforced by traditional concepts of privacy”); cf. Violence Against Women: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Crime and Criminal Justice of the Committee on the Judiciary House of Representatives, 102d Cong. 8 (1992) ("I might add a point on that study [from Rhode Island that the Chairman] mentioned... where it said one-quarter of all the young men of junior high school age believed that if a man spends $10 on a woman he is entitled to force sex on her. That is startling. What is even more startling is that one-fifth of the girls thought the same thing... We have a cultural problem in this country") (statement of Sen. Biden) [hereinafter Violence Against Women Hearing].

21. See infra notes 51-52 and accompanying text.

reintroduced in 1991 and 1993, and was finally passed in 1994. From 1990 to 1994, extensive hearings were held on the bill regarding the prevalence and impact of violence against women. For example, Congress learned that between 1988 and 1992, violence was the “leading cause of injury to women ages 15 to 44, more common than automobile accidents, muggings, and cancer deaths combined.” As of 1988, three out of four American women were likely to be the victims of violent crimes in their lifetime. Moreover, the rate of violent crimes against women has been increasing. For example, between 1988 and 1992, the rate of incidence of rape rose four and a half times as fast as the total crime rate—meaning one rape every five minutes. Estimates of the rate at which rape is reported indicate that only seven

24. Id.
27. Id. (citing U.S. Dep't. of Justice, Report to the Nation on Crime and Justice 29 (2d ed. 1988)).
28. Congress heard that since 1974, “the rates for assault and many other violent crimes against women have increased dramatically, while the rates for the same crimes against men have actually declined.” 139 Cong. Rec. H10,363 (daily ed. Nov. 20, 1993) (statement of Sally Goldfarb) (citations omitted), quoted in Easterling, supra note 9, at 938-39.
30. Id. A 1992 study found that approximately 12.1 million—or 13 percent—of women, had experienced a minimum of one forcible rape during their lifetime. Angela Browne, Family Violence and Homelessness: The Relevance of Trauma Histories in the Lives of Homeless Women, 63 AM. J. ORTHOPSYCHIATRY 370, 370 (1993) (citation omitted). In 1991, 106,593 completed forcible rapes and 153,120 rapes were reported. ADAM DORBIN ET. AL., STATISTICAL HANDBOOK ON VIOLENCE IN AMERICA 44, 56 (1996). (The Handbook only includes rapes against women in these and the following statistics.) Between 1981 and 1982, and between 1992 and 1993, the number of reported rapes declined slightly; otherwise, the number of rapes has steadily increased since 1960. Id. Of completed rapes, 13.7% were committed by a spouse, 5.1% by an ex-spouse, 2.6% by another relative, 39.5% by a well-known but unrelated person, 28.5% by a casual acquaintance, and only 10.6% by a stranger. Id. at 65. In 1993, there were 416,590 reported rapes and sexual attacks on women while there were 41,930 rapes and sexual attacks reported by men. Id. at 62. Excluding homicide, rape is the most devastating crime for its victims—the emotional scars and continued fear as well as any physical harm can profoundly affect the victims for years. CHARLES W. DEAN & MARY DEBRUYN-KOPS, THE CRIME AND CONSEQUENCES OF RAPE, at v (1982).
For a brief discussion of rape in which men are the victims, see Frazee, supra note 9, at 221-22 (reporting that “up to ten percent of all rape victims are men” and noting that “[t]hough many have used examples of rape against men to belittle the reality of sexual violence against women, only by acknowledging male rape can one understand critical components of male sexual violence”) ( citations omitted).
percent\textsuperscript{31} to about half of all rapes are reported.\textsuperscript{32}

Congressional hearings also showed that, in addition to rape, domestic violence disproportionately plagues women.\textsuperscript{33} Accounting for underreporting, approximately four million American women are battered annually by their husbands or partners.\textsuperscript{34} In 1991, at least 21,000 domestic crimes were reported to the police each week, which translated into at least 1.1 million aggravated assaults, rapes, and murders\textsuperscript{35}--more than twice the number of reported robberies.\textsuperscript{36} Unsurprisingly, "about 35 [percent] of women visiting hospital emergency rooms were there due to injuries sustained as a result of domestic violence."\textsuperscript{37} In addition, Congress found that at least fifty percent of homeless women were fleeing domestic violence.\textsuperscript{38}

The cost of this violence is seen through the one million women each year that seek medical attention for injuries caused by domestic violence.\textsuperscript{39} The \textsuperscript{31} Willis, supra note 9, at 2199 n.21 (quoting Legislation to Reduce the Growing problem of Violent Crime Against Women: Hearings on S. 2734 Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 77 (1990)). "Rape remains the most under-reported of all major crimes." \textit{Id}.

\textsuperscript{33} Ninety-five percent of victims of domestic violence are women. H.R. REP. No. 103-395, at 26.

\textsuperscript{34} \textit{Id.} (citations omitted).

\textsuperscript{35} S. REP. No. 103-138, at 37 (1993). "Unreported domestic crimes have been estimated to be more than three times this [number]." \textit{Id}. Approximately one-third of all women murdered were murdered by their husbands or boyfriends. \textit{Id.} at 41. For a brief discussion of the underreporting of violent assaults, see Choundas, supra note 6, at 1086-87.

\textsuperscript{36} Comm. Print, supra note 25, at 2.

\textsuperscript{37} \textit{Id.} at 26 (citations omitted); see also S. REP. No. 103-138, at 41 (finding that the country spends $5 to $10 billion a year on health care, criminal justice and other social costs of domestic violence) (citation omitted).

\textsuperscript{38} S. REP. No. 101-545, at 37 (1990). An in-depth study of 141 homeless women revealed that 63% had been assaulted by an adult partner and 58% had been raped, reflecting higher rates of such traumas than those found among a comparable group of housed women. Browne, supra note 30, at 372 (citation omitted). Similar studies showed: 41% of homeless women had been physically assaulted by a male partner, compared to 20% of the housed women; that 34% of homeless, versus 16% of housed, women reported spousal violence; and 27% of homeless, versus 17% of housed, women reported assaults or threats of violence by at least one intimate partner. \textit{Id.} (citations omitted).

\textsuperscript{39} S. REP. No. 103-138, at 41 (citations omitted); see also H.R. REP. No. 103-711, at 385 (1994), \textit{reprinted in} 1994 U.S.C.C.A.N. 1839, 1851 (finding that crimes of violence have a substantial adverse effect on interstate commerce by increasing medical and other costs); H.R. REP. No. 103-395, at 26, (stating that about "35% of women visiting hospital emergency rooms are there due to injuries sustained as a result of domestic violence"). The Surgeon General reported in 1993 that battering was the "single largest cause of injury to women in the United States." Easterling, \textit{supra} note 9, at 939 (citations omitted).

These traumas also result in a number of common reactions, including depression, withdrawal, and compromised functioning in daily activities. LINDA E. LEDRAY, RECOVERING FROM RAPE 90-92, 95 (2d ed. 1986); see also DEAN & DEBRUYN-KOPS, \textit{supra} note 30, at 110-12; LIZ KELLY, SURVIVING impact that the violence has on the economy is also evident in the adverse effect that it has on women’s participation in the workforce. For example, some women do not accept jobs because they fear that the hours or location where they would need to work would be too risky.\textsuperscript{40} Others cannot work or are limited in what they can do because the abusive spouse wants to maintain control over them.\textsuperscript{41} Congress also found that “almost 50 percent of rape victims lose their jobs or are forced to quit in the aftermath of the crime.”\textsuperscript{42} One of the negative effects of these statistics is that national productivity decreases to the extent that interstate commerce is substantially affected.\textsuperscript{43} For example, related absenteeism from work has been estimated to cost employers three to five billion dollars annually. Interstate commerce is also adversely affected by the fact that women are discouraged from traveling interstate, and therefore, from engaging in employment in interstate business.

Congress not only found that profound economic and social costs emanate from gender-motivated violence but also concluded that state remedies have responded inadequately to this social ill. Legislative findings indicated that "crimes disproportionately affecting women are often treated less seriously than comparable crimes affecting men." For example, there is "overwhelming evidence . . . that gender bias permeates the court system."
Women who are raped by an acquaintance are often accused of provoking the attack\(^{49}\) and seven states still do not consider marital rape a prosecutable offense.\(^{50}\) While "almost every [s]tate has passed laws that increase criminal penalties" for hate crimes (i.e. crimes motivated by bias)\(^{51}\) and many of these laws provide civil remedies for victims, fewer than a dozen have covered gender bias as of 1991.\(^{52}\) Federal law has duplicated this neglect of gender hate crimes, as evidenced by the Hate Crimes Statistics Act,\(^{53}\) which requires the collection of statistics on crimes motivated by race, ethnicity, national origin, and sexual orientation, but not on crimes motivated by gender.

\(^{49}\) S. REP. No. 102-197, at 47; see also Eileen N. Wagner, The Secret On-Campus Adjudication of Sexual Assault, *2 (Nov. 1996) ("Illogical assumptions about sexual contact turn the criminal analysis of rape on its head, focusing the probing element of criminal intent away from the usually male perpetrator and onto the usually female victim."), available at <http://www.soconline.org/LEGAL/BRZONKALA> (visited Apr. 7, 1997).

\(^{50}\) S. REP. No. 102-197, at 45 n.50 (citation omitted). Furthermore, an additional 26 states allow prosecutions only under limited circumstances. Id. (citation omitted) For further discussion of the prevalence of marital rape and the barriers to prosecuting marital rape, including a complete bar, lower levels of criminality, and limitations on circumstances covered, see Developments, supra note 16, at 1533-34.

In addition to the inadequacies of state criminal law, state tort law proves an insufficient remedy for a victim's need for vindication and compensation. See id. 1430-1533 (discussing interspousal tort immunity, uniquely strict standards for intentional infliction of emotional distress claims, and statutes of limitations); see also Willis, supra note 9, at 2203 ("While state tort laws may allow victims to sue for damages, the focus is on the physical injury and not on the additional injury imposed by class-based animus.").

\(^{51}\) S. REP. No. 103-138, at 48.

All hate-crime laws impose harsher penalties for offenses committed because of the victim's possession of a set of characteristics designated by statute and based on group membership. The laws differ, however, in two significant respects. First, states employ different methods to increase the penalties for bias motivated crimes. ... [T]he other significant variation ... [is that] state legislatures have adopted different combinations of the following as the statutory set of characteristics triggering harsher penalties: race, color, religion, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, disability, and veteran status. Choundas, supra note 6 at 1078-81 (citations omitted); see also Frazee, supra note 9, at 188-97 (discussing hate crime statutes and describing different forms of hate crime laws).

\(^{52}\) S. REP. No. 103-138, at 48. "While race, color, religion, and national origin are universally included in hate-crime legislation as hate-crime motives, twenty-one states fail to include gender within their statutes." Choundas, supra note 6, at 1081 (citing all 21 statutes) (citation omitted). For an explanation as to why gender has been excluded, see Frazee, supra note 9, at 197-205. Mr. Frazee also discusses the problems of simply adding gender to traditional models of hate crime statutes as a remedy for gender-based violence. Id. at 206-12. For an Equal Protection critique of hate crime statutes that exclude gender, see Choundas, supra note 6, at 1095-1106.

B. The Response: VAWA and Title III

In response to these findings, Congress decided to enact the Violence Against Women Act, which was "intended to respond both to the underlying attitude that this violence is somehow less serious than other crime and to the resulting failure of our criminal justice system to address such violence." As part of this effort, the VAWA created Title III, which provides a federal civil rights remedy for gender-based violent crimes in order to help make such crimes considered as serious as other hate crimes and to provide victims "the opportunity to vindicate their interests." Having recognized under Title

54. S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 38; cf. Choundas, supra note 6, at 1082-83 ("The frequency with which women are targeted for violent assault, coupled with the fact that women constitute half the population, fuels a perception of such acts as essentially random and unrelated manifestations of the general danger of social violence to which all are exposed. . . . The reality, however, is one in which women suffer injury and death precisely because of their gender.").

55. The Act also authorizes $1.67 billion over six years for grants to support state and local law enforcement and prosecution efforts to reduce violent crime against women, 42 U.S.C. § 3796gg (1994), for education and prevention programs, 42 U.S.C. § 300w-10 (1994), for battered women's shelters, 42 U.S.C. § 10409(a)(1994), and for community programs on domestic violence, 42 U.S.C. § 10418 (1994). In addition, the Act establishes two new federal felonies for interstate domestic violence and interstate violation of a protection order, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2261, 2262 (1994), and proposes amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence regarding the admissibility of the past sexual behavior of victims in criminal and civil sex offense cases, 28 U.S.C. § 2074 (1994). For a discussion of the battle that was fought in Congress to obtain an actual appropriation of funds to realize these plans, see generally Patricia Schroeder, Stopping Violence Against Women Still Takes a Fight: If in Doubt, Just Look at the 104th Congress, 4 J. L. & POL'Y 377 (1996). See also Schneider, supra note 20, at 1249 (stating that the concerns that generated the VAWA "have not yet been translated into resources for battered women or a broad range of policy initiatives"). In addition, the Omnibus Appropriations Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009 (1996), provides for a gun ban for individuals convicted of a misdemeanor crime of domestic violence. 18 U.S.C. § 922(g)(8) (1994).

56. S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 38. Congress intended to help establish that such crimes are "not merely an individual crime or a personal injury, but [are] also a form of discrimination." Id. at 48. Consequently, "[t]he provision's purpose is to provide an effective anti-discrimination remedy for violently expressed gender prejudice." Id. at 38; see also S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 41 (1990).

[G]ender-crime victims may be said to be particularly deserving of enhanced protection in at least three respects. First, their exclusion from the scope of statutes extending heightened protection to other targeted groups further aggravates the disproportionate extent to which they are subjected to the harms of bias-motivated violence. Second, the unique resistance and prejudicial indifference of the criminal justice system with which women victims are confronted tend to amplify the disproportionate harms of the violence they experience. Third, the everpresent and ubiquitous threat of gender-motivated violence arguably inspires a fear more comprehensive, invasive, and inhibiting than that experienced by other types of bias-crime victims.").

Choundas, supra note 6, at 1094 (citations omitted).

57. H.R. Rep. No. 103-711, at 383 (1994). The Judiciary Committee noted that "criminal laws are intended to vindicate the State's interest in the protection of its citizens, not the victim's interest in equal treatment . . . . Similarly, State civil laws are not focused on the discriminatory aspect of gender-motivated crime. . . . [S]tate tort law was never intended to protect individuals' civil rights." Willis,
VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act that gender discrimination can take the form of a lost pay raise or promotion, Congress acknowledged through Title III that gender discrimination may disguise itself in the form of a violent criminal attack.

The cause of action under Title III is strictly limited to violent felonies motivated by gender. Consequently, in order to state a claim, a victim must show that the crime was generated, at least in part, by the victim’s gender. This means that random crimes in the home or elsewhere cannot serve as a basis for a Title III claim. As a result, Title III’s coverage excludes many of the “traditional” domestic violence cases due to the difficulty of proving that the abuse resulted partly from the attitude of the male partner towards females rather than towards his wife in particular.

Title III was the most controversial provision of the VAWA. The most lasting and vehement criticism came from federal judges, including Chief Justice Rehnquist, and rested upon a theory that Title III would overwhelm the federal judiciary with allegedly gender-motivated cases, particularly domestic violence cases. The federal judiciary did not, however, object to supra note 9, at 2202-03 (alterations in original) (citations omitted).

---

59. Id. at 50.
60. Violence Against Women Hearing, supra note 20, at 10. As a result, a woman cannot establish a cause of action by saying, “I am a woman; I have a bruise; ergo, I have a civil rights claim.”
61. Id. at 26.
62. Id. at 25-26; see also Frazee, supra note 9, at 190 (explaining that “[i]n acquaintance situation, especially in ‘domestic’ situations, proving that one was selected for an attack as a representative of one’s entire gender will prove a nearly impossible burden [because Title III contains] . . . gendered logic that permeates model bias crime statutes”).
63. Violence Against Women Hearings, supra note 20, at 9 (statement of Sen. Biden, original sponsor of the VAWA). Some critics initially asserted that the civil rights provision was unconstitutional but, after hearings with numerous scholars, that criticism soon dissipated. Id. at 9 (statement of Sen. Biden). Another concern raised but later dropped was that Title III would encourage women to raise false claims in order to obtain more alimony. Id. at 11 (statement of Sen. Biden).
64. Id. at 8, 10-11, 25. For a discussion of this and other federalism arguments for and against the VAWA, see Easterling, supra note 9, at 943-48. For a discussion of why fear of a flood of federal litigation arising from Title III is unfounded, see Developments, supra note 16, at 1546-47 (concluding that the federalism objections to the VAWA that are based on policy grounds “continue to mistake
Title III on constitutional grounds.\textsuperscript{65}

III. THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TITLE III

A. Summary of the Cases

\textit{Doe v. Doe}\textsuperscript{66} presented the claim of a woman who had been "systematically and continuously inflicted [with] a pattern of physical and mental abuse and cruelty" by her husband for seventeen years.\textsuperscript{67} In its Commerce Clause analysis,\textsuperscript{68} the \textit{Doe} court relied on \textit{United States v. Lopez}\textsuperscript{69} and looked to whether a "rational basis"\textsuperscript{70} existed for Congress to conclude that gender-based violence "substantially affect[s] interstate commerce."\textsuperscript{71} After reviewing the legislative history,\textsuperscript{72} the \textit{Doe} court held that the congressional findings and reports "qualitatively and quantitatively demonstrate the substantial effect on interstate commerce of gender-based violence."\textsuperscript{73}

The court distinguished the federal civil rights remedy under the VAWA from the Gun Free School Zone Act struck down in \textit{Lopez}. The court stated that the Gun Free School Zone Act rested on "only theoretical impact arguments” and lacked evidence of the requisite connection to interstate commerce that was established under the VAWA.\textsuperscript{74} While the \textit{Lopez} Court was left to speculate\textsuperscript{75} in order to find the necessary connection between the regulated activity and interstate commerce, the “extensive compilation of data, testimony, and reports [behind the VAWA show a] ... repetitive nationwide impact of women withholding, withdrawing or limiting their participation in the workplace or marketplace in response to or as a result of gender-based violence or the threat thereof\textsuperscript{76} such that interstate commerce is substantially affected. Although the authority for enacting the VAWA rested largely on the “cost of crime” and “national productivity” arguments that were criticized in \textit{Lopez},\textsuperscript{77} the court reasoned that the Court’s dicta was not determinative of the outcome, as it did not “overturn or limit the rationality test,” which Title III satisfied.\textsuperscript{78}

In addition to finding the requisite relationship to interstate commerce, the \textit{Doe} court rejected arguments that Title III violates the Tenth Amendment limitation on the Commerce Clause by impermissibly encroaching on traditional powers of the state or by federalizing state law.\textsuperscript{79} With regard to the former argument, the court stressed that while \textit{Lopez} noted that states have the primary authority to create and enforce criminal law, federal courts across the country have not interpreted this statement to mean that all federal criminal law is unconstitutional.\textsuperscript{80} Furthermore, \textit{Doe} found that Title III does not infringe upon state authority in the area of criminal law enforcement but instead complements it.\textsuperscript{81} In response to the claim that Title III unconstitutionally federalizes state criminal and tort law, the court concluded that the civil remedy supplements rather than supplants or alters these areas of state law.\textsuperscript{82} Regarding family law,\textsuperscript{83} the court noted that the VAWA explicitly excludes such law from Title III’s reach.\footnote{DOE, 929 F. Supp. at 616. (citing 42 U.S.C. § 13981(e)(4)). The court also held that the means employed by the VAWA for remedying the identified problem is “reasonably adapted to its intended end.” \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 782, \textit{at} 782. The second defendant admitted that he engaged in sexual contact and that the victim had told him “no” twice. \textit{Id.} The committee suspended the second defendant from school for two semesters, a sanction that was reimposed in a second hearing. However, after a second appeal by the defendant, the committee set aside the sanction without warning to Ms. Brzonkala. \textit{Id.} For a discussion and critique of schools’ responses to sexual assault, see generally Wagner, supra note 49.}

\textit{Brzonkala} \textit{v. Virginia Polytechnic and State University}\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 784-82. For additional description of Ms. Brzonkala’s assault, see \textit{Brzonkala} Brief, supra note 9, at 1-2. Although Ms. Brzonkala filed a complaint under the school’s Sexual Assault Policy, the school’s judicial committee found insufficient evidence to take action against one defendant, who denied sexual contact. \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 782. The second defendant admitted that he engaged in sexual contact and that the victim had told him “no” twice. \textit{Id.} The committee suspended the second defendant from school for two semesters, a sanction that was reimposed in a second hearing. However, after a second appeal by the defendant, the committee set aside the sanction without warning to Ms. Brzonkala. \textit{Id.} For a discussion and critique of schools’ responses to sexual assault, see generally Wagner, supra note 49.} involved a former student at Virginia Polytechnic Institute who was gang raped in her dormitory.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 781-82. For additional description of Ms. Brzonkala’s assault, see \textit{Brzonkala} Brief, supra note 9, at 1-2. Although Ms. Brzonkala filed a complaint under the school’s Sexual Assault Policy, the school’s judicial committee found insufficient evidence to take action against one defendant, who denied sexual contact. \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 782. The second defendant admitted that he engaged in sexual contact and that the victim had told him “no” twice. \textit{Id.} The committee suspended the second defendant from school for two semesters, a sanction that was reimposed in a second hearing. However, after a second appeal by the defendant, the committee set aside the sanction without warning to Ms. Brzonkala. \textit{Id.} For a discussion and critique of schools’ responses to sexual assault, see generally Wagner, supra note 49.} The \textit{Brzonkala} court analyzed the constitutionality\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 784-82. For additional description of Ms. Brzonkala’s assault, see \textit{Brzonkala} Brief, supra note 9, at 1-2. Although Ms. Brzonkala filed a complaint under the school’s Sexual Assault Policy, the school’s judicial committee found insufficient evidence to take action against one defendant, who denied sexual contact. \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 782. The second defendant admitted that he engaged in sexual contact and that the victim had told him “no” twice. \textit{Id.} The committee suspended the second defendant from school for two semesters, a sanction that was reimposed in a second hearing. However, after a second appeal by the defendant, the committee set aside the sanction without warning to Ms. Brzonkala. \textit{Id.} For a discussion and critique of schools’ responses to sexual assault, see generally Wagner, supra note 49.} of Title III under the Commerce Clause\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 784-82. For additional description of Ms. Brzonkala’s assault, see \textit{Brzonkala} Brief, supra note 9, at 1-2. Although Ms. Brzonkala filed a complaint under the school’s Sexual Assault Policy, the school’s judicial committee found insufficient evidence to take action against one defendant, who denied sexual contact. \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 782. The second defendant admitted that he engaged in sexual contact and that the victim had told him “no” twice. \textit{Id.} The committee suspended the second defendant from school for two semesters, a sanction that was reimposed in a second hearing. However, after a second appeal by the defendant, the committee set aside the sanction without warning to Ms. Brzonkala. \textit{Id.} For a discussion and critique of schools’ responses to sexual assault, see generally Wagner, supra note 49.} by applying what it determined was a four part test established by \textit{Lopez}. First, the court looked to the “nature of the regulated activity.”\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 784-82. For additional description of Ms. Brzonkala’s assault, see \textit{Brzonkala} Brief, supra note 9, at 1-2. Although Ms. Brzonkala filed a complaint under the school’s Sexual Assault Policy, the school’s judicial committee found insufficient evidence to take action against one defendant, who denied sexual contact. \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 782. The second defendant admitted that he engaged in sexual contact and that the victim had told him “no” twice. \textit{Id.} The committee suspended the second defendant from school for two semesters, a sanction that was reimposed in a second hearing. However, after a second appeal by the defendant, the committee set aside the sanction without warning to Ms. Brzonkala. \textit{Id.} For a discussion and critique of schools’ responses to sexual assault, see generally Wagner, supra note 49.} The court interpreted the \textit{Lopez} Court as critically distinguishing between the regulation of intrastate activities that are economic in nature and the regulation of intrastate activities that are noneconomic.\textsuperscript{90} While \textit{Brzonkala} did not assert that the economic or noneconomic nature of the activity is conclusive, the court found that this determination is "a very relevant consideration."\textsuperscript{91} Furthermore, the \textit{Brzonkala} court contended that previous Commerce Clause decisions regarding economic activities cannot control cases, like the one at bar, which involve a noneconomic activity.\textsuperscript{92} Consequently, \textit{Brzonkala} rejected the \textit{Doe} court's analysis on this point. The court concluded that \textit{Doe} impermissibly relied on a comparison of the noneconomic activities regulated under Title III with economic activities regulated by certain statutes that have been upheld under the Commerce Clause.\textsuperscript{93} In contrast, the \textit{Brzonkala} court emphasized that the activity being regulated in Title III, like that in \textit{Lopez}, involves local criminal activity which is neither commercial nor economic in nature.\textsuperscript{94}

Second, the court determined whether the law contained a jurisdictional element, which guarantees through a case-by-case inquiry that the activity within a given case affected interstate commerce.\textsuperscript{95} Although the court stated that it is unclear if such a requirement is mandated, it concluded that the requirement may be necessary.\textsuperscript{96} Therefore, Title III’s lack of a jurisdictional element was weighed heavily against its constitutionality.\textsuperscript{97}

Third, the court dealt with the issue of whether legislative findings, while unnecessary, could support a conclusion that the regulated activity substantially affects interstate commerce, given no such affect was "visible to the naked eye."\textsuperscript{98} Preliminarily, the \textit{Brzonkala} court stressed that a court conducts an independent analysis of the regulated activity’s impact on \textsuperscript{90} \textit{Id.} at 787. ("[The Gun Free School Zones Act] is a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with 'commerce' or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms. [The Gun Free School Zones Act] is not an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated. It cannot, therefore, be sustained under our cases upholding regulations of activities that arise out of or are connected with a commercial transaction, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce.") (quoting \textit{United States v. Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. 1624, 1630-31 (1996)).

\textsuperscript{91} \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 787.

\textsuperscript{92} \textit{Id.} at 787, 791; see also supra note 90 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{93} \textit{Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 791-92.

\textsuperscript{94} \textit{Id.} at 791.

\textsuperscript{95} \textit{Id.} at 787 (citing \textit{Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. at 1631).

\textsuperscript{96} \textit{Id.} at 792.

\textsuperscript{97} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{98} \textit{Id.} at 787 (quoting \textit{Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. at 1631-32).
interstate commerce. After reviewing the legislative history, the court dismissed Congress’s findings of a substantial relationship between gender-motivated violence and interstate commerce as insignificantly different from the relationship claimed by the federal government under the Gun Free School Zones Act at issue in Lopez and, therefore, as insufficient to bring Title III under the Commerce Clause power.

Fourth, the court analyzed the practical implications of holding that Title III is a valid exercise of the Commerce Clause power. Concluding that the proximity of violence against women to interstate commerce is not significantly different than that between guns in school zones and interstate commerce, the Brzonkala court determined that upholding Title III would, as in Lopez, “excessively extend[] Congress’s power and . . . inappropriately tip[] the balance away from the states.” While the court recognized that violence against women has a major effect on the national economy, the court noted that a substantial effect on the national economy neither always nor in this case translates into a substantial effect on interstate commerce. According to the court, holding that activities which substantially affect the economy are subject to federal regulation by virtue of the economy’s simple

---

99. Id. at 789-90.
100. Id. at 791. Although the Brzonkala court initially laid out the rational basis test, the court failed to use this language when it determines that gender-motivated violence against women does not substantially affect interstate commerce. The Lopez Court made clear that while the Gun Free School Zones Act does not meet the rational basis test, the Court is not narrowing the test. On the contrary, the Court stressed that it was declining to expand further the reach of the Commerce Clause, which it believed upholding the Gun Free School Zones Act would have done. Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1634.

102. Id. at 790-91.
103. Id. at 792. The court also stated that “[f]amily law issues and most criminal issues affect the national economy substantially and in turn have some effect on interstate commerce. These too have interstate travel implications. However, to extend Congress’s power to these issues would unreasonably tip the balance away from the states.” Id. at 793. After acknowledging that the VAWA explicitly excludes divorce, alimony, the distribution of property, and child custody from the coverage of Title III, the Brzonkala court decided that this fact was “utterly insignificant to the practical implications of accepting the regulated activity as having a substantial effect on interstate commerce.” Id. For a discussion of this federalism argument against the VAWA, see Easterling, supra note 9, at 944-45.
effect on interstate commerce would permit Congress to regulate "much activity which should be left to state control."\textsuperscript{105} As a result, the court struck down Title III.\textsuperscript{106}

B. A Critique

A closer look at \textit{Lopez} shows that the holding of the \textit{Doe} court was correct. There are several problems with the \textit{Brzonkala} court's analysis and these weaknesses are critical to the court's holding. First, the \textit{Brzonkala} court placed a significant amount of weight on the economic or noneconomic nature of the activity being regulated—here, gender-motivated violence against women.\textsuperscript{107} While the \textit{Lopez} Court affirmed that Congress can regulate intrastate economic activity that substantially affects interstate commerce,\textsuperscript{108} nowhere did the \textit{Lopez} Court state that the economic or noneconomic nature of the activity is as determinative as the \textit{Brzonkala} court would lead one to believe.\textsuperscript{109} \textit{Lopez} simply did not address the regulation of noncommercial activity that substantially affects interstate commerce.\textsuperscript{110} Decisions by the \textsuperscript{105} \textit{Id.} If the VAWA were deemed constitutional, the court would be "hard-pressed to posit any activity by an individual that Congress is without power to regulate" \textit{Id.} (quoting \textit{Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. at 1632).

\textsuperscript{106} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{107} \textit{Id.} at 787.

\textsuperscript{108} \textit{Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. at 1630.

\textsuperscript{109} \textit{Brzonkala} Brief, \textit{supra} note 9, at 16; Intervenor Brief, \textit{supra} note 9, at 18; Kelly G. Black, \textit{Removing Intrastate Lawsuits: The Affecting-Commerce Arguments After United States v. Lopez}, 1995 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 1103, 1124 (1995) ("Identifying an activity as noncommercial, however, does not of necessity foreclose its regulation."); \textit{see also id.} at 1131 ("Even after \textit{Lopez}, the government could frame an argument for regulation of other subsets of noneconomic activities that in the aggregate have a substantial effect on interstate commerce."). Also, \textit{Brzonkala} misread \textit{Lopez} when it rejected \textit{Doe's} interpretation of Title II in light of previous Commerce Clause cases in which the regulated activity might have been more economic in nature. \textit{See Brzonkala}, 935 F. Supp. at 784. The \textit{Lopez} Court did not say that such previous Commerce Clause cases could not be applied to the Gun Free School Zones Act because the regulated activity was noncommercial. Instead, the Court stated that previous Commerce Clause cases could not be used to uphold the Gun Free School Zones Act because the regulated activity had not been established as having the requisite effect on or connection with interstate commerce. \textit{Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. at 1630-31; \textit{see also supra} note 90 and accompanying text.

At most, \textit{Lopez} implies that noncommercial activities may receive somewhat more rigorous scrutiny. \textit{See Black, supra} note 109, at 1118 (saying that \textit{Lopez}, by analogy with other opinions, Supreme Court that closely predate111 Lopez and that have been rendered since Lopez,112 however, support the conclusion that intrastate noneconomic activities substantially affecting interstate commerce are still within the reach of the commerce power. These decisions are consistent with the fact that the Court “has never held that Commerce Clause jurisdiction extends only to commercial or economic actors.”113 On the contrary, it is clear that such “suggests that activities can be more or less commercial, and the more commercial the activity, the more likely its regulation will be upheld”); Russel F. Pannier, Lopez and Federalism, 22 WM. MITCHELL L. REV 71, 98 (Although “it is doubtful that the Court intended to suggest [that the subject-matter directly regulated must be commercial,] ... [a] less radical interpretation could take these remarks about ‘commerce’ as stating that regulations of noncommercial matters ... trigger a heightened degree of judicial scrutiny.”); Philip P. Frickey, The Fool on the Hill: Congressional Findings, Constitutional Adjudication, and United States v. Lopez, 46 CASE W. RES. L. REV. 695, 706 (1996) (concluding that the Lopez concurrence by Justice Kennedy and joined by Justice O'Connor indicated that the noneconomic nature of the regulation was crucial to the Court's rigorous inquiry about effects on interstate commerce) (citations omitted); cf supra note 109 and accompanying text.

111. See Brickey, supra note 100, at 808. Professor Brickey notes that a year before the Supreme Court decided Lopez, the Court dealt with a variant of the problem of how the economic or commercial nature of a regulated activity affects its viability under the Commerce Clause in National Organization for Women, Inc. v. Scheidler. Id. The defendants in Scheidler were "engaged in a pattern of extortion committed through arson, fire bombings, and other criminal acts designed to intimidate abortion clinic employees and women seeking abortions." Id.

To sustain the suit, the plaintiffs had to prove that the protesters conducted the affairs of an enterprise—here, the coalition of anti-abortion groups—through a pattern of extortionate activity.

The issue in NOW was whether a RICO enterprise must have an economic motive or goal [and the Court concluded that it did not].

[A]n enterprise could have a detrimental effect on commerce even though it had no profit-seeking motive or goal.

Arguments focusing on the economic motive of the enterprise "overlook[ed] the fact that predicate acts, such as alleged extortion, may not benefit the protesters financially but still may drain money from the economy by harming businesses such as the clinics."

Thus, the only "economic enterprise" with which the protesters had any conceivable connection was the clinics themselves. But they were connected with the clinics only in the sense that they objected to medical procedures the clinics performed. They were noncommercial actors whose activities disrupted commercial enterprises engaged in or affecting interstate commerce.

Id. at 808-11.

112. See Scott, supra note 110, at 531. Scott analyzes United States v. Robertson, 115 S. Ct. 1732 (1995), in which the Court "upheld the application of the Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act (RICO) to a business-related crime occurring primarily within one state" Id. Scott concludes that Robertson may establish that the Court is not determined to expand Lopez and curtail Congress's commerce power "to include only commercial activities. Id.

113. Brickey, supra note 100, at 807.
jurisdiction "has been extended to noneconomic activity."\textsuperscript{114} And in \textit{Lopez}, the Court explicitly stated that it was maintaining, rather than expanding or contracting, Commerce Clause precedent.\textsuperscript{115}

This reasoning is consistent with the fact that while looking for a "rational basis"\textsuperscript{116} for concluding that gun possession near schools "substantially affects"\textsuperscript{117} interstate commerce, the Court warned not against the regulation of noneconomic activity but rather against the regulation of any activity whose effects upon interstate commerce are "so indirect and remote that to embrace them, in view of our complex society, would effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local."\textsuperscript{118} The Court explicitly reaffirmed that as long as the effect is substantial, activities that only indirectly\textsuperscript{119} or cumulatively\textsuperscript{120} affect interstate commerce are within \textsuperscript{114} \textit{Id.} (noting possession of a firearm has been determined to affect[\textit{commerce}) (citing \textit{Scarborough v. United States}, 431 U.S. 563, 571-75 (1977)); see also \textit{Pannier}, supra note 110, at 72-73 (saying that "commerce includes . . . cattle walking back and forth in pastures [and] carrying liquor for personal use in one's own vehicle. . . . The sample suggests a generalization. 'Commerce' includes any activity, process, event or state of affairs—human or nonhuman, commercial or noncommercial."; \textit{Frickey}, supra note 110, at 712 ("The cases upholding the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 indicated that Congress no longer even needed an economic motivation to exercise its commerce power.").

\textsuperscript{115} See supra note 100; see also \textit{Brickey}, supra note 100, at 811 ("[I]f \textit{Lopez maintains Commerce Clause analysis}, one can only conclude that . . . noncommercial activity that adversely affects an economic enterprise engaged in commerce is subject to Commerce Clause jurisdiction.").

\textsuperscript{117} \textit{Id.} at 1630 ("Case law has not been clear whether an activity must 'affect' or 'substantially affect' interstate commerce [but] consistent with the great weight of . . . case law, . . . the proper test . . . [is] whether the regulated activity 'substantially affects' interstate commerce." (citations omitted).

\textsuperscript{118} \textit{Id.} at 1628-29 (quoting \textit{NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.}, 301 U.S. 1, 37 (1937)); cf. \textit{Hirsh, supra note 110}, at 510 ("[C]ommercial and noncommercial activities [may not] always be equal. . . . At some point . . . the noncommercial activity becomes too attenuated. . . . Like many other things, it is a matter of degree.").

\textsuperscript{119} \textit{Id.} at 1628 (reviewing \textit{Jones & Laughlin Steel}, 301 U.S. 1; \textit{United States v. Darby}, 312 U.S. 110 (1941); and \textit{Wickard v. Filburn}, 317 U.S. 111 (1942)). The Court discussed the development of Commerce Clause jurisprudence and the clear and consistent rejection of the distinction between direct and indirect effects. \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{120} \textit{Id.} (emphasizing that although the individual activity at issue in a case may be "trivial by itself, that was not 'enough to remove [it] from the scope of federal regulation where . . . [the activity], taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial'") (quoting \textit{Wickard}, 317 U.S. at 127-28). See also \textit{Lopez}, 115 S. Ct. at 1629 ("The Court has said only that where a general regulatory statute bears a substantial relation to commerce, the de minimus character of individual
Congress's power to regulate under the Commerce Clause. Quoting Wickard v. Filburn, the Court stated that "even if [the] activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce." This interpretation of Lopez is further supported by several federal circuits that have heard Commerce Clause challenges to statutes since Lopez and have not required that the regulated activity be economic in nature.

Second, the Brzonkala court erroneously concluded that Lopez appears to require a jurisdictional element, which ensures through case-by-case inquiry that the activity being regulated affects interstate commerce. Although the Lopez Court did discuss this element, it only turned to this element as an alternative way to save the statute because the Court had already determined that gun possession as a class of activity was insufficiently connected to interstate commerce. In other words, if a class of activity does not substantially affect commerce, Congress can regulate the individual instances of that activity that are shown to have such an effect. This interpretation has instances arising under that statute is of no consequence") (quoting Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 197 (1968)).

121. 317 U.S. 111 (1942).
126. Id. at 1631 (citing with approval United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336 (1971)). Bass held that although mere possession of a firearm may not be subject to Commerce Clause power, the statute, which made it a crime for a felon to "receive[e], possess[e], or transport in commerce or affecting commerce . . . any firearm" was constitutional. Bass, 404 U.S. at 337. The Lopez Court then stated that "[u]nlike the statute in Bass, the [Gun Free School Zones Act] has no express jurisdictional element which might limit its reach to a discrete set of firearm possessions that additionally have an explicit connection with or effect on interstate commerce." Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1631; see also Black, supra note 109, at 1130 ("Still another route to regulation of economic activity is to require the satisfaction of a jurisdictional element.") (emphasis added).
127. See Brickey, supra note 100, at 823 ("If the class of activities as a whole affects commerce, also been supported by several circuits that have upheld statutes without a jurisdictional requirement. 128

Third, although the Brzonkala court correctly stated 129 that a court's "rational basis" determination may be informed by legislative findings but is independent of them, 130 the court erred in holding that no rational basis exists for concluding that gender-motivated violent crimes substantially affect interstate commerce. This conclusion is supported by a brief review of other Commerce Clause cases that the Lopez majority discussed with approval. For example, in Maryland v. Wirtz, 131 the Court upheld the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which regulates hours and wages, to employees of schools and hospitals even though these institutions did not ship goods or compete in interstate commerce. 132 The Court reasoned that poor working conditions might cause labor unrest that could "interrupt and burden [the] flow of goods across state lines." 133 Similarly, in Perez v. United States, 134 the Court upheld the Consumer Credit Protection Act, which outlawed extortionate credit transactions (i.e. loansharking). 135 The Court reasoned that Congress could have believed that loan sharking affects interstate commerce because it supports organized crime which "exacts millions from the pockets of people, coerces its victims into the commission of crimes against property, and causes the takeover by racketeers of legitimate business." 136 In Katzenbach 137 and its companion case, Heart of Atlanta Motel, 138 the Court then an individual instance of the activity need not be shown to do so. In consequence, the finding serves as a proxy for an express jurisdictional element."

(citations omitted); Black, supra note 109, at 1130 ("Where an activity does not as a class come within Congress's constitutional authority, Congress can nevertheless regulate individual instances of that activity that do come within its power by including a jurisdictional element in the statute.").

128. See supra note 123 and accompanying text.
130. Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1631-32. While the Court makes an "independent evaluation" and Congress "normally is not required to make formal findings as to the substantial burdens" on interstate commerce, such findings "would enable [the Court] to evaluate the legislative judgment that the activity in question substantially affected interstate commerce, even though no such substantial effect was visible to the naked eye." Id.; see also id. at 1129 n.2 ("[W]hether particular operations affect interstate commerce sufficiently to come under the constitutional power of Congress to regulate them is ultimately a judicial rather than a legislative question, and can be settled finally only by this Court." (quoting Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 273 (1964) (Black, J., concurring)).
132. Id. at 201.
133. Id. at 195.
135. Id. at 147.
136. Id. at 156.
upheld the 1964 Civil Rights Act as applied to restaurants which received a substantial amount of food that at some time had moved in commerce139 and to public accommodations which provided lodging to "transient guests," respectively.140 In reasoning that generally applies to both cases, the Katzenbach Court explained that the congressional findings provided a sufficient basis for concluding that such establishments sold fewer "interstate goods because of the discrimination, that interstate travel was obstructed directly by it, that business in general suffered and that many new business refrained from establishing" themselves as a result of it.141 All of these cases employed "substantial effects" language.142

Given this framework, there is a rational basis for concluding that gender-based violent crimes cumulatively have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Unlike in Lopez, one does not have to "pile inference upon inference"143 in order to see the relationship between gender-motivated

139. Katzenbach, 379 U.S. at 305. The district court held that the restaurant's 46% of food that had at one point moved in commerce satisfied the substantial portion test. Id. at 296-97.
140. Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S. at 247, 252.
141. Katzenbach, 379 U.S. at 300.
142. Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 189, 196 n.27 (1968); Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 152 (1971); Katzenbach, 379 U.S. at 302; Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S. at 250, 252, 255, 258. For a discussion about the ambiguity regarding whether the Court has adopted an "effects" test or a "substantial effects" test in different Commerce Clause cases, see United States v. Lopez, 115 S. Ct. 1629, 1629-31 (1995); Lino A. Graglia, United States v. Lopez: Judicial Review Under the Commerce Clause, 74 TEX. L. REV. 719, 727-33 (1996); and Scott, supra note 110, at 519, 525-26. See also EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226 (1983). EEOC v. Wyoming upheld the constitutionality of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act as applied to game wardens. Id. at 234, 243. The case could also be used to buttress the constitutionality of Title III. The regulated activity was discrimination against employees over 40. Id. at 232. This activity was considered to exert significant influence on businesses, which would thereby exert substantial influence over interstate commerce. Id. at 241. Although Justice Rehnquist, the author of the majority opinion in Lopez, dissented in EEOC v. Wyoming, his disagreement was not over whether the discrimination could be reached under the Commerce Clause power but rather over whether the Tenth Amendment limitation on the Commerce Clause was implicated. Id. at 252. The reasons he cited for the ADEA's failure to pass the Tenth Amendment test are inapplicable to Title III. Id. at 251-65.

In Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Ass'n, the Court upheld Congress's regulation of intrastate surface mining operations because Congress found that the mining adversely affected commerce by, among other means, "diminishing the utility of land for commercial, industrial, residential, recreational, agricultural, and forestry purposes," by "impairing natural beauty," and by "degrading the quality of life in local communities." 452 U.S. 264, 277 (1981) (quoting 30 U.S.C. § 1201(c) (1994)). The Court found not just a rational basis but rather "ample support" for these findings. Id. Justice Rehnquist concurred in the judgment and wrote separately only to clarify that the statute was upheld because the regulated activity "substantially" affected, as opposed to just "affected," interstate commerce. Id. at 312-13 (Rehnquist, J., concurring).

violent crimes against women and interstate commerce. In Lopez, the government argued that the presence of guns near schools affected the learning environment, which in turn hampered the educational process, which thereby created a less productive citizenry, which in turn adversely affected the economy, which then substantially affected interstate commerce.\(^{144}\) While the Brzonkala court accurately asserted that the substantial effects of gender-based violence are realized in the economy before exerting force on interstate commerce,\(^{145}\) Lopez clearly accepted an indirect effect on interstate commerce.\(^{146}\) And, contrary to the Brzonkala court’s conclusion,\(^{147}\) the congressional findings\(^{148}\) demonstrate a rational basis for concluding that this substantial effect on the economy has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Although the absence of such findings in Lopez was allegedly not independently fatal to the statute in that case,\(^{149}\) the legislative history of Title III provides the information and link that the Lopez Court needed and was lacking.\(^{150}\)

---

144. Id. at 1632. The Government also argued that the medical costs associated with crime and people’s unwillingness to travel constituted a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Id.
148. See supra notes 26-45 and accompanying text.

We agree with the Government that Congress normally is not required to make formal findings as to the substantial burdens that an activity has on interstate commerce. But to the extent that congressional findings would enable us to evaluate the legislative judgment that the activity in question substantially affected interstate commerce, even though no such substantial effect was visible to the naked eye, they are lacking here.

Id. (citations omitted). But see Graglia, supra note 142, at 767 (stating that the Court invalidated the statute because of the absence of legislative findings).
150. See United States v. Lopez, 2 F.3d 1342, 1363-64 (5th Cir. 1993), aff’d, 115 S. Ct 1624 (1995).

Where Congress has made findings, formal or informal, that regulated activity substantially affects interstate commerce, the courts must defer “if there is any rational basis for” the finding. Practically speaking, such findings almost always end the matter. [However,] courts cannot properly perform their duty to determine if there is any rational basis for a Congressional finding if neither the legislative history nor the statute itself reveals any such relevant finding.

Id.

Insofar as the question [of whether a particular activity substantially affects interstate commerce] is one of magnitude (an empirical question), the Court is in no position to contradict a (presumed) congressional determination of the substantiality of the effect. It is difficult for the Court to contradict Congress’s definition of substantiality when it has no alternative definition of its own....

The Constitution, it is true, has been interpreted to permit judicial overriding of congressional Finally, the Brzonkala court erred in concluding that the practical implications of holding Title III constitutional mirrored those that the Lopez Court feared would result if it upheld the Gun Free School Zones Act. First, when analyzing the Tenth Amendment limitation on the Commerce Clause, the Lopez Court did reject the government's "cost of crime" and "national productivity" arguments. The Court did not, however, say that these justifications were inherently flawed. On the contrary, Perez v. United States, cited with approval by the Lopez Court, is one of several cases that demonstrates that the "cost of crime" reasoning may serve as a rational basis for finding a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Similarly, Katzenbach and Heart of Atlanta Motel rested on a theory of the "cost of discrimination," yet the Lopez Court cited these cases approvingly because of the substantial effects on interstate commerce found in them.

What the Lopez Court did clearly hold was not that these bases are categorically excluded as justifications for invoking the Commerce Clause determinations, but only, presumably, when the Constitution provides a judicially enforceable rule of law. The Commerce Clause does not provide such a rule, even with the aid of the Tenth Amendment.

Graglia, supra note 142, at 769.

The Court may give Congress more leeway to regulate noncommercial activities such as intrastate litigation if Congress makes strong, factually grounded findings connecting the activities with interstate commerce... Reading the opinions together, it appears that findings would likely make a difference to a majority of the Court only in cases involving activities with nonobvious effects on interstate commerce, effects which, once established, can be shown to be substantial.

Black, supra note 109, at 1132-33; see also Frickey, supra note 110, at 707 (concluding that the Lopez Court considered the lack of findings to "negate one source of potential support for the proposition that the statute had a rational connection to interstate commerce" and that "the Court did not clearly repudiate the proposition that formal findings might have tipped the scales in the case") (citations omitted); id. at 712 ("[T]he Supreme Court in Perez signaled that the presence of formal congressional findings should lead to extraordinary judicial deference in assessing the constitutionality of legislation."). But see Scott, supra note 110, at 531 (concluding that "Lopez may demonstrate that the determination of what is 'commercial' is within the hands of the Court, not Congress").

152. Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1632. (The government argued that violent crime costs, through insurance, are spread throughout the population.

153. Id. at 1632.

155. Id. at 154-56; see also United States v. Robertson, 115 S. Ct. 1732 (1995) (per curiam) (upholding RICO as applied to an Arizona resident who used drug money to obtain and operate a gold mine in Alaska); Russell v. United States, 471 U.S. 858 (1985) (upholding an arson statute as applied to a defendant who burned a privately-owned apartment building); Scarborough v. United States, 431 U.S. 563 (1977) (upholding a statute prohibiting convicted felons from possessing firearms).

https://openscholarship.wustl.edu/law_lawreview/vol75/iss1/18 power but rather that they were insufficiently established in Lopez to satisfy the necessary connection with interstate commerce. To accept these arguments in the context of the Gun Free School Zones case, in which no substantial effect on interstate commerce was found, would allow Congress to regulate "not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to interstate commerce." As reaffirmed by Lopez, the rationality based substantial effects test, not the label of the association, is what determines whether or not an activity may be regulated by Congress. Lopez supports this interpretation through its discussion of Wirtz. The Court first quoted Justice Douglas' dissent in Wirtz, which warned that the majority decision might permit regulation of "[a]ll activities affecting commerce, even in the minutest degree." The Lopez Court then responded that "[n]either here nor in [other precedents] has the Court declared that Congress may use a relatively trivial impact on commerce as an excuse for broad general regulation of state or private activities," but that the regulation of activities substantially affecting 158. Id. at 1632. Likewise, accepting the national productivity argument in this context, due to the very attenuated relationship between gun possession and interstate commerce, would permit any activity that affected economic productivity to be regulated by Congress. Id.; see also Brickey, supra note 100, at 829 (stating that "the Court made clear its position that ... Congress cannot regulate all activity that is related to productivity") (emphasis added); Black, supra note 109, at 1131-32 ("Indeed, the decision in Lopez could be seen as applying only where the relationship to commerce is weak in similarity ... effect, and proximity.").

---

159. See supra note 109 and accompanying text.

161. Id. at 1629 (quoting Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 204 (1968) (Douglas, J., dissenting)).

162. Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1629 (quoting Wirtz, 392 U.S. at 197 n.27). Similarly, in Perez, which the Lopez Court cites approvingly, the dissent criticizes the majority's decision upholding the regulation of loansharking by claiming that it is not enough to say that loan sharking is a national problem, for all crime is a national problem. It is not enough to say that some loan sharking has interstate characteristics, for any crime may have an interstate setting. And the circumstance that loan sharking has an adverse impact on interstate business is not a distinguishing attribute, for interstate business suffers from almost all criminal activity, be it shoplifting or violence in the streets. Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 157-58 (1971) (Stewart J., dissenting). Nevertheless, the majority states:

> We have mentioned in detail the economic, financial, and social setting of the problem as revealed to Congress.... We relate the history of the Act in detail to answer the impassioned plea of petitioner that all that is involved in loan sharking is a traditionally local activity. It appears, instead, that loan sharking in its national setting is one way organized interstate crime holds its guns to the heads of the poor and the rich alike and syphons funds from numerous localities to finance its national operations.

Id. at 156-57.
interstate commerce does not violate this principle.\textsuperscript{163} For the same reason, the \textit{Perez} Court also dismissed the dissent's warning that upholding the regulation of loansharking permitted the federalization of nearly all crime,\textsuperscript{164} which could be said to satisfy the "affecting business" rationale employed by the majority.\textsuperscript{165} The multiplicity and strength of the effects of gender-motivated violence on interstate commerce\textsuperscript{166} are much greater than those resulting from gun possession in school zones\textsuperscript{167} and it is this difference that proves critical.

Second, the \textit{Lopez} Court did demonstrate concern about the Gun Free School Zones Act's intrusion upon state authority in the criminal and educational spheres.\textsuperscript{168} Nevertheless, the \textit{Brzonkala} court misevaluated the significance of the concern\textsuperscript{169} and the impact that Title III has on state law. \textit{Lopez} did not hold that federal criminal law unconstitutionally infringes on state powers. In contrast, \textit{Perez}\textsuperscript{170} and similar cases\textsuperscript{171} show definitively that criminal law is still an acceptable area for federal regulation. \textit{Lopez} did conclude, however, that the Gun Free School Zones Act in particular "inappropriately overrode legitimate state firearms laws with a new and unnecessary Federal law."\textsuperscript{172} In contrast, Title III fills a gap left by the states and does not infringe upon state criminal law.\textsuperscript{173}

\\[\text{\textsuperscript{163} Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1629-30. The other two categories of activity that congress may regulate under its Commerce Clause power are “the use of channels of interstate commerce” and “the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities.” Id. at 1629.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{164} Perez, 402 U.S. at 157-58 (Stewart, J., dissenting).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{165} Id.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{166} See supra notes 38-45 and accompanying text.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{167} Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1632.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{168} Id. at 1632 (“[I]t is difficult to perceive any limitation on federal power, even in areas such as criminal law enforcement or education where states historically have been sovereign.”).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{169} See Pannier, supra note 110, at 99-100 (“A more plausible ... interpretation would construe the Court's statements [about the states possessing primary authority for criminal law and about not allowing the Commerce Clause to be expanded so as to be applicable to family law] as merely indicating that regulations of subject matters traditionally regulated by the states trigger some kind of heightened judicial scrutiny. If this is the result intended by the Court, then no significant limitation upon Congressional power has been effected.”).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{170} Perez, 402 U.S. at 156-57.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{171} See supra note 156 and accompanying text.}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{172} Lopez, 115 S. Ct. at 1631 n.3 (citation omitted).}\]

\[\text{\textsuperscript{173} See supra notes 46-52, 82 and accompanying text; see also Frazee, supra note 9, at 251-56 (listing twelve ways in which a civil rights remedy provides what state law does not).}\]

Criminal statutes, even hate crime statutes, are not an adequate substitute for civil rights legislation though they can function well in conjunction with each other. Victims do not have control over [any of these] prosecutions ... When gender is included in hate crime laws, they may not help
IV. CONCLUSION

Look back at the stories described at the beginning of this article. These reports are disturbing, but not surprising. Although the acts that spurred each of these reports may not, by themselves, substantially affect interstate commerce, the thousands upon thousands of such acts perpetrated across the country do. Furthermore, granting a civil rights remedy to the victims of such crimes neither encroaches upon nor alters local remedies. The federal government has traditionally held a substantial role in guaranteeing individuals protection from bias-motivated violence; Title III simply aims to grant this basic civil right to victims of gender-motivated violence as well.174 victims of gender-motivated violence because judges and juries embody [discriminatory attitudes that work against such victims]. Also, the wide variation of available remedies among states argues for the necessity of a federal civil rights remedy. State laws cannot create a national standard of anti-discrimination or equality. More importantly, biases in state laws, as well as the administration of justice which deny equal rights to women, create a compelling reason for a federal remedy.

Carolyn Peri Weiss

Id. at 196; Pannier, supra note 110, at 92 (“When Congress criminalizes conduct already denounced as criminal by the States, it effects a change in the sensitive relation between federal and state criminal jurisdiction.”) (citations omitted) (emphasis added); Willis, supra note 9, at 2202 (noting that Title III “hope[s] to provide new remedies not presently available to rape victims through state court actions”) (emphasis added). Unlike the Gun-Free School Zones Act, Title III is not “part of a burgeoning body of federal criminal law, much of which overlaps with or merely duplicates state crimes.” Brickey, supra note 100, at 839. Furthermore, Title III limits the provision’s coverage to areas of civil rights and explicitly refuses to trespass on state law in areas of divorce, alimony, equitable distribution of marital property, or child custody. 42 U.S.C.A. § 13981(e)(4) (1995). The Brzonkala court erroneously disregarded as insignificant this limitation on Title III’s reach. See Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic Inst. & State Univ., 935 F. Supp. 779, 793 (W.D. Va. 1996).

174. See Developments, supra note 16, at 1547; Frazee, supra note 9, at 255 (stating that federal remedies “have proven necessary and effective in the past when local jurisdictions were either unwilling or unable to protect the rights of their citizens”).